The mutiny of the scouts at Duncan, an account of which appeared in last week's issue, might have assumed serious proportions, it is said, had not the citizens interfered and esponsed the side of the troops, as the Indians were ready to attack the soldiers, though the latter outnumbered them by five. Colonel Bradley somehow straightened the affair out, and the party left next day for Horse Springs, New Mexico. The scouts were Navajos, and the authorities evidently feared to deal with them as the law of mutiny in the field demands, for fear of an uprising of that powerful tribe. It was a serious breach of military discipline, but perhaps on the whole, was justified by the circumstances With the Apaches and Navajos Tuesday for a business trip to El | both at us, we should indeed be in a wretched plight.
